

Utopia ~ Roseline de Boer
18 september 2012

In an ideal world there is no reason not to be happy and everyone cooperates with each other. To achieve the first goal, it is necessary to set up life guidance rules - also known as laws - which aim to divide the wealth to whomever needs it and to stimulate everyone to get the best out of themselves. To enable everyone to cooperate freely with each other, it is inevitable to share the same language. When everyone were to speak the same language, there are no 'lost in translations' occurrences, apart from very cultural aspects. Cooperating is now much easier than when you cannot even explain your desires and needs.

In an ideal world there is no abuse of the rules. The first step is to make the laws approachable to the people, which both means it is nicely indexed and translated in a comprehensible form. In this way the direct benefit of the rules is presented, thus making it more interesting to follow these rules. The second step is to enforce the rules strictly, whoever willingly contravene the laws get to face the consequences.

With these baselines there are laws which stimulate the people and there is a high cooperation between different cultures, enabling great projects with expert from all over the globe. The laws divide the wealth to whomever needs it in a way that the state invests in services, rather than giving money directly to the weaker people in the society. On the other hand, it is possible to get a day-job without much bureaucracy. Those who are struggling to find a job, can apply in the morning for a simple day task with a lower income. Companies in return result to be more flexible, by hiring someone only for a day for a smaller cost. One method to stimulate the people to achieve more is providing education. Not only for the starters in the society, but also later on with part-time study programs.